All in all, enjoyable film, just felt room for improvement. Highly recommended! 🔥

Also wandering around the woods that day are a park ranger (a randy Margo Martindale) and a wildlife specialist (Jesse Tyler Ferguson); a bunch of doofus teenagers; and a determined single mom (Keri Russell) looking for her 13-year-old daughter (Brooklynn Prince) and her daughter's friend (Christian Convery) who ditched school to visit the falls. (Both kids are great in a throwback way, reminiscent of the kinds of brash, profane characters you'd see in movies like "The Bad News Bears" or "The Goonies." The boy's reaction to discovering one of these illegal bundles is not fear, but rather a cheerful: "Let's sell drugs together!") Much of the joy of "Winnie The Pooh: Blood And Honey" comes from the look of the creature itself, which is surprisingly high-tech for a cheesy, silly movie. She's been brought to life through a motion capture performance by stuntman Allan Henry and CGI from the legendary New Zealand house Weta FX. They've definitely amped up the movements and anthropomorphized the animal to a knowing extreme, but they achieve enough realism to make the bear's attacks harrowing. You'll laugh and squeal throughout, but you'll also scream and squirm. The violence is often so graphic and so gory. Some of the gnarliest moments come not from the bear herself, but rather from all of these people being stupid and finding other ways to get injured.
